The notion of employees choosing to strategically underperform runs counter to the traditional understanding in most management literature, which has been dominated by studies of increasing performance. Yet, we are seeing employees choose to underperform on purpose. I am intrigued to address what seems to be a counterintuitive phenomenon prevalent in today’s workforce. In three essays, my dissertation develops and tests a theory of strategic underperformance—examining the motives and implications of strategically underperforming. In Essay 1, I review the disparate literature to develop an integrated conceptualization of strategic underperformance. In Essay 2, I qualitatively develop a theoretical model of the psychological processes of strategic underperformance. In Essay 3, I investigate which gender and racial combinations result in more social consequences for strategically underperforming, and develop an intervention to mitigate these effects.

RESEARCH INTERESTS

- Motives & consequences of performance outliers (i.e., high/low performer)
- Multilevel implications of organizational & task structures
- Mixed-methods research (e.g., experimentation; qualitative; longitudinal; meta-analysis; integrative review)
